THE REVOLT IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Governor Hoyt's Famous Letter—A Powerful Broadside against the Boss Machine.

The following is the celebrated letter written by Governor Hoyt, of Pennsylvania, just before Tuesday's election in that state. It is remarkable as coming from a man who has always been a republican, the most pronounced kind, and who, as a republican, was elected to the high office which he holds. It hoot hot despite the lightning that hour after hour, and has a value due to the selections as an index of the strength of the general revolt which produced the revolution recently accomplished.

HARRISBURG, PA., Nov. 3, 1882.—To Wharton Barker, Esq., Philadelphia—Adhering to the accepted traditions of our people, I take the liberty, while holding a public office, respectfully to address a citizen as a fellow-citizen upon a public question. This course is rendered necessary by the fact that the Republican party, which need not be urged, will be found my adherent at every invitation to provide a fit assembly of independent republicans at Horticultural Hall, on Philadelphia, to-night.

I understand the object of this gathering of careful and judicious citizens will be give effect to a plain declaration of the public sentiment of the state. It is the assertion of the inherent right of the people of a public to declare the proper aims and tenets of public parties, and to organize them into a public and purposes. The right belongs to every individual and in open assembly. A political party is a voluntary association, and in no sense can the right be said to be lost until it is exercised, or even the accident of its including the mere levels form of the majority.

This statement, however, is no longer allowed to the members of a political party with a margin for self-respect, which includes simply intermittent service for limited periods of time, and which, in the interval between adjournment and relapse, there is no place is allowed for a good, sagacious or practical, or even a sane suggestion. Its principles are dictated, its nominations made, its platform and its candidates selected, and its organization controlled and directed by the agents of a corporation, which has long been in open and avowed hostility to the people of the state, and which has long been in open and avowed hostility to the people of the state, and which has long been in open and avowed hostility to the people of the state.

Whereupon opportunity offers, residents of the state for also suggested that they may have been driven from their homes, wherever these may be, by a system which has achieved several distinctions of the American fellow-citizens, to want of shelter. Indians are expatriated all Indian chiefs and carried off to different parts of the war territories, where they are compelled to work on plantations established far away from anything hearth and home. BLAINE'S DISTEMPER.

Persons not of news in the metropolis are thus accustomed to think it doubtful whether Blaine really means what he says when he declares his intention not to be a candidate for the next place. It may be natural enough to question the sincerity of every politician, or at least all those who should be given credit for some grades of political sense. No man knows more thoroughly the political status of the country. Of the margin and extent of the differences in the Republican party, and of the conditions of them, he has special knowledge. One great section of the party has looked to him during ten years past as its leader. In consequence he has become an object of marked hostility to another section of the party. He knows this, he knows never would support him, and therefore, though he wants to be president, he has to adjudge and realize that it is entirely out of his power. In other circumstances his authority might, perhaps be doubted; but such, as matters now are, he can't possibly unite his party, since he knows well enough he can't unite it, and, therefore, that he couldn't be elected. If he should get the nomination, his disclaimer of any purpose to be a candidate may be received as the utterance of a man who has common sense and acts upon it.

In one particular the conclusion of the news gatherer who attempts to sum up public opinion on this point is doubtless correct, namely, that there are not so many Blaine men as in 1880. For this there are several reasons among them these: The people get tired of standing candidates for the presidency, and, as they obtain a near view of their methods of seeking support, lose enthusiasm in their behalf. Blaine's methods have not differed much from those of other aspirants. He has put forth every possible effort to secure votes in national conventions; and the people don't like this, no matter by whom attempted. Again a large part of the support he had in the conventions of 1876 and 1880 was drawn to him as the most available means of making an effective opposition to the Grant-Conkling-Cameron combination. Therefore Blaine has appeared to have a strength which really has not belonged to him. Some man who is not identified with presidency-seeking will be taken by the republicans as their candidate. There is little more probability that the choice will fall upon Mr. Blaine than upon Mr. Conkling; and it may be added, no probability whatever that it will fall upon either, or upon any other of the standing candidates.

THE IOWA AMENDMENT.

Quite a stir has been made in Iowa by a judicial decision pronounced a few days ago against the constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in that state. In the district court at Davenport, Judge Walter J. Hayes presiding, an agreed case was brought to test the validity of the amendment. The plaintiffs, who are brewers, sold beer amounting to $1.3 to a saloon-keeper, who refused payment on the ground that the bill could not be collected by law. After hearing the case the court held it for a considerable time under advisement, and finally decided that the amendment was invalid because of informalities in the proceedings which led to its adoption. The decision rests on two grounds—(1) that the act submitting the amendment is not set forth in full in the journals of the legislature, nor is there any record of the yeas and nays taken on the bill; and (2) that the two houses of the legislature did not pass the same bill, the one adopted by the senate prohibiting the use of liquor for any purpose whatever, and the house prohibiting only its use as a beverage. If this judgment should be sustained by the higher courts, the latest prohibitory experiment would come to grief even earlier than those which have preceded it. Usually such efforts are defeated by the failure to enforce the law, but, whether by a blunder or by design, the Iowa legislature seems to have anticipated the result by making the effort futile in its very inception. There is much excitement among the prohibitionists of the state in consequence of the decision of the court; but it is not yet known whether they will be content to go to the higher courts on appeal, or will drop the amendment as it now stands and start another through the legislature, which shall be free from these imperfections, and which can be submitted to the people for their judgment on a future occasion.

THE GERM THEORY OF DISEASE.

The theory that diseases are frequently communicated by means of bacteria, spores and other diminutive germs occupies no inconsiderable share of the attention of the scientific world. Dr. Koch, a German physician, advances the idea that consumption is due to a growth of minute parasites upon the lungs, and Prof. Tyndall takes strong grounds in support of his conclusions. Tyndall has carefully studied the quest on, with a view to discovering some antidote or means for counteracting or mitigating the evils occasioned by these disease bearing particles as they float through the air. Bacteria, however, possesses a wonderful tenacity of existence, which renders their destruction an exceedingly difficult task, and has repeatedly baffled the efforts of scientists. They exist in decayed animal and vegetable matter, and other substances or solutions. Carbonic acid and numerous gases have been introduced into the solutions, but the bacteria, nevertheless, survived. Cyanogen in gaseous form appeared at first to exercise a baneful effect upon them; but they became accustomed to it, and in about a week its action was powerless to lessen their activity. Prof. Tyndall claims that boiling these solutions or heating them to 140 degrees fahrenheit will annihilate the germs; and this theory, though warmly antagonized by Dr. Bastian, a champion of spontaneous generation, is regarded by many as having been conclusively demonstrated. Boiling, however, would be necessarily limited in its beneficial effects, as its scope would not extend to insects floating in the air or those found in wounds or ulcers; but even if means were adopted for destroying bacteria before they set forth on their pestiferous errands, much disease might be averted. Should their conclusion prove, in the light of future discoveries to be accurate Koch and Tyndall will deserve the gratitude of humanity for their labors in therapeutics. In any event, the fact that so distinguished a scientist as Prof. Tyndall has devoted his attention to the subject indicates that the learned men of to-day entertain far more rational and enlightened ideas than those prevalent among their predecessors in former ages. Many of the Greek philosophers held that while a student was pursuing a laudable course in mastering geometry and mechanics purely for his own mental improvement, he lowered himself to the level of a plebeian by applying them to any particular or useful purpose. Hypatia maintained that a woman of scientific tastes should despise the duties of a wife or mother, and though Friar Bacon invented gun powder, it was a month many decades had passed that Schwartz utilized its powerful explosive capacity. Now one of the most prominent scientists of the age recognizes that the human mind can find no limits of the most glorious and enrobbing as those which tend to increase the sum of human happiness by diminishing the sum of human misery. But the thought is a forest other thoughts, is a very wise one. Cicero said that it is way and a man approaches near the gods in his conferring health on man; and Cicero surveyed the expression, as he hurried nearly all else he ever said that had any thought in it out of the literature of old Greek philosophy—old even in his day.

Speaking of democratic victories in the election just the result of Gov. Hoyt's contest the "machine" the New York Times says: "Unfortunately there is not a prospect of any reform of somewhat independent character. Indeed, for there is every prospect in the direction of lower. That is a result at which every intelligency must rejoice." When the organ of republican journal in the union can speak in the way, what wonder is it that the masses had resolved to do so in a form so that large class of politicians who aim at success through controlling management, the control of public patronage and the brute force of corporation, instead of an enlightened representation of the convictions, interests and wishes of the people?

Among the literary publications that once held high rank in England was Fraser's Magazine. It has now ceased to exist. It was a publication of the old school, and took little of the tone of modernized thought. Hence it has been superseded by magazines which possess a modern savor. Yet many great names in literature first became known through Fraser's Magazine. Carlyle's Sartor Resartus first appeared as a serial in its pages. Dickens and Thackeray often wrote for it. The fact that it has expired proves that each generation calls for expression of its own feelings and tastes in current publications. Men who want to study heraldry, genealogy, and character of past times know where to go for the matter also.

The London Times objected, rather unnecessarily, to the placing of Mr. Longfellow's bust in Westminster Abbey, on the somewhat narrow ground that the abbey should be reserved for memorials of English worthies exclusively, and that there is no space in it for international monuments. If this were all it could be said against giving American poets and scholars a place in it, the New York Evening Post thinks, the objection would be worth little consideration. For the great lights of English literature, it well says, wherever born, can never be foreigners in this sense which the Times uses the term; and as for Mr. Longfellow, there is a rare blameless in his title to his fame throughout the English-speaking world.

Until recently it has been difficult to account for the growth of Kansas City, one of the most uninviting cities in the United States. Now, however, the mystery is clearing up. It is well known that the state line between Missouri and Kansas divides the city, leaving most of it in Missouri, but quite a slice in Kansas. The Kansas portion of the city is given entirely over to the gamblers, and contains no less than nine thriving faro banks. By going to Kansas City, Mo., the sports can get their allowance of liquors in a state where there is no prohibition, but strict gambling laws; and in five minutes get into Kansas City, Kansas, where there are no gambling laws, but strict prohibition laws.

The government of New York city for this year will cost the taxpayers $27,412,831, and the sum of $31,999,458 is asked for the coming year. The principal appropriations this year were for schools, $4,000,000; police, $2,681,000; interest on city debt, $6,000,000; public works, $3,000,000; charities, $1,610,000; fire department, $1,631,000; street cleaning, $2,138,000, and state taxes, $3,218,400.

Ex-Gov. Tom Young of Ohio—a republican—predicts that in fifteen years there will be no Sunday in the United States. Curiously enough several democratic papers are taking this as a prophecy that their party is coming into power about of before that time.

PROF. MURPHY OF THE MT. TABOR PUBLIC school, has given better satisfaction than any other teacher heretofore employed in that district. From his pupils have learned more in two months than they did from any other teacher in twenty, and the entire Hornung style which they have. The directors especially are pleased with the improvement in their children, made under his care. Some parents he would rather forfeit $100 than have him leave the district. The professor is not only an excellent teacher, but is also attentive and efficient in the performance of his duties in the K. M. TAYLOR.

OCTAVIA'S HOUSEKEEPING.

"They are coming, Viney!"

Miss Nancy Crowfoot nipped her ball of blue yarn into her apron pocket, and shading her eyes with one hand, looked down the lane where tall mulberry trees threw their long shadows on the velvety grass.

"Coming, Miss Nancy!" echoed a sweet voice.

And pretty Viney Marvis hastily shorted a gooseberry pie into the oven, and came out on the back porch, with a drapery of pink and violet cupped morning glory vines.

She, too, gazed eagerly down the long lane, and soon the sapphire blue eyes sparkled and the pink tinted cheeks broke into dimpling smiles.

"Its them!" she cried. "I could tell old Dapple's jog 'ten a mile away."

Viney had been up since peep of day, when the first tint of pink blushed in the eastern sky, and when the thrush and the orchard wire thrilling to the earliest morning tunes.

She had milked the sleepy looking cows, their dewlaps still wet from contact with the dripping grass, and had breakfast ready just as the crimson sun was peeping over the cloud-capped hills, chasing the horses of the great Father of Waters.

It was an extraordinary occasion, as Farmer Marvis was going to the station, twelve miles distant, to bring home his only daughter, Octavia, from boarding-school.

"Don't you bother yourself about the breakfast Viney," said the farmer good naturedly, as he lighted his cob pipe at the kitchen fire. "I can eat a snack and have breakfast when we get home."

But Viney would not hear to it, and with her own hands she fried her uncle's favorite johnny cakes, yellow with eggs, poured out his coffee, and set a glass of fresh milk at his plate.

"Dinner will be all ready when you get back, uncle so bring a good appetite," she said kissing him good-bye.

It was a happy family that dwelt at the old brown farm house.

Farmer Marvis was good nature personified, and Miss Nancy, the housekeeper, was a sweet tempered old maid; not so very old either, for the youthful crinkles still lurked in her soft brown hair, and her cheeks were as rosy as a winter pear main just touched by the frost. She was a distant connection of farmer Marvis and had kept house for him ever since the death of his wife, some six years ago.

Viney was his niece and was as dear to him as his own daughter.

Great were the preparations made for Octavia's home coming. Miss Nancy had scoured the windows and made up the plump beds with fresh, lavender scented sheets and pillow slips, and the best home-spun coverlet.

And Viney had rolled a substantial dinner—roast chicken and cream biscuit, new potatoes and green peas and cauliflower, with custard and gooseberry for dessert.

In meantime Octavia was on the cars, speeding along at the rate of a mile a minute. She was a sharp featured, tain lipped girl, with light hair, and face as freckled as a turkey's egg.

"I am going home to keep house for my pa," she said affectedly, to her girl crones, "it is sure to be a sort of relative keeping home now—an old maid—but I shall soon set her adrift. I detest old maids."

In due time Octavia reached home. She restowed a cool cold cir Miss Nancy, and to that Viney's finger tips frigidly.

"Mercy on us!" she cried, in a thin, high voice, as she entered the house, "Dinner on at this hour? How horrid! What does make pa keep such old-fashioned hours?"

Miss Nancy and Viney stood aghast at this unlooked for reception.

"We had it parlor than usual on your account, Octavia," ventured her cousin. "We thought you might need something."

"Need something, indeed," ruffled Octavia with a sneer on her thin lips. "Do you suppose I've been starved where I come from? Besides I had a lunch on the cars. I am going up to my room to take a nap, now," she added. "It will be soon enough for dinner after that."

And she swing out of the room without waiting for a reply.

"Wal, of that don't beat all!" exclaimed Farmer Marvis, his honest blue eyes expanding with surprise. "If Octavy thinks we're goin' to wait for her to nap it afore we eat dinner, she can think so, that's all. Fetch along the coffee, Viney!"

* * *

"I shall take the head of the table myself, now, Miss Nancy," declared Octavia, as she came down to breakfast in a pink gingham morning dress, not at all suitable to her sallow complexion and red hair. "My pa can't afford to keep a hired housekeeper, how I'm at home, so you be best look out for another situation. Of course we could give you references for honesty, etc.," and Octavia jingled the teaspoons in the cups and took her place at the head of the table, with a flourish of the tripets, as it were.

Never was the surprise of Farmer Marvis when Octavia informed him that Miss Nancy was going away.

Several of the smaller cities show healthy gains. The aggregate of these figures that would be agreed to represent probably large, and contrasts favorably even in comparison with a week of great activity last year. It cannot be said that the enlargement indicates a healthy state of business. There is no gauge to which of a speculative character for financial gauge to which of a speculative character for financial gauge. It does not matter whether the disease breaks out in the provinces or within stock markets, it is the same disease and does much the same mischief. It is decidedly not a good thing that some 8 to 10 of the 10 one week much more than one-half the shares of petroleum that had ever been freed out in the twenty four years since the oil was first produced.
